Impaired retinal function in rheumatoid arthritis: a critical role for oxidative stress-induced dysregulation of the inflammatory pathway? The objective of this study was to characterize retinal function and neuroinflammatory mechanisms in rheumatoid arthritis (RA) and determine if the retinopathic changes correlate with measures of systemic disease activity. Patients with RA (n = 29) were prospectively identified from a University affiliated rheumatology clinic. Retinal electrophysiologic testing was performed with the standard 30-Hz flicker ERG and multifocal ERG (mfERG) using the VERIS® System (Electrodiagnostic Imaging, Redwood City, CA). Z scores were calculated for each amplitudes and implicit times and the data were compared between RA and healthy controls. CRP, IL-6, and ESR were measured in the blood of study participants. As previously described, there was significant central cone dysfunction as demonstrated by the mfERG amplitude loss (mean \pm SD: -5.2 ± 14.1 μ V; $P < 0.0001$). A similar result was found in terms of retinal cone function as shown
